Teachers in Nottingham are rightly outraged at the prospect of a five-term year. It would be chaotic and disruptive for teachers, parents and pupils.

There is no proven educational benefit to a five-term year. Evidence produced by Nottingham City Council in favour of the change comes from the United States, where Summer holidays last 10-12 weeks. No other council in the country has decided to adopt the five-term year. This will make recruitment and retention in the city difficult.

What's wrong with the five-term year?

The five-term year would create terms that were eight to nine weeks long. This is too long, particularly for young pupils.

Children in city schools with siblings in county schools would be on different holiday patterns.

Academies and foundation schools in the city won't have to adopt the five-term year and some have already said they will remain on the three-term year.

Local businesses would suffer as staff would have to take their Summer holidays in a shorter four-week period if they want to spend the holiday with their children.

The NASUWT wants to engage positively with the city council during the consultation period. We are working with parents, governors, headteachers and other unions to stop the city council following this disastrous path. Please support us by coming to the lobby on Wednesday 16 May to show the city council the strength of our opposition to the five-term year.

Together we can make a difference.
